Not illustrated. 1884 Excerpt: . little toil I cause a mighty sweet, My body is made up of many folds. My long thin bones one single sinew holds, My bones, which may be parted, but must meet. You will not find in me the serpent s wile, And yet like him I change both skin and hue, And show myself in quite another style, So that men know me not, I seem so new. Then the whole company gave up guessing, unless an ingenuous pe itc-maitresse burst out with an tuitixa, in a cry of joy, and produced her Fan as a solution of the problem. Rabener, in his Satyres, in the chapter headed Means to Discover by Exterior Signs Secret Thoughts, has but given a superficial idea of the language of Fans in these few lines which we translate: -- A woman who criticises the dress of those of her society has a particular manner of playing her Fan. This implement assumes quite another figure when she who carries it is offended. When a woman agitates her Fan, and smilingly regards her hand and the looking-glass, I consider it a proof that she is thinking of nought, or what is the same thing, that she is thinking only of herself, or lastly, that she is awaiting with impatience the hour which she has appointed for a rendezvous. When a woman out walking meets one of her aspirants, and lets her Fan fall, it is an invitation; if she adds...
